The Sampson of 1860. The celebrated Dr. Winship been lecturing in Philadelphia and ex hibiting some of his powers. H. spoke of the importance of physical training, and gave a synopsis of his own method. In regard to lifting, he said, he at first commenced with four hundred pounds, and gradually increased the weight, until, at the end of six months, he could lift seven hun dred with his hands. A month ago he could lift one thousand and fifty hundred and three. He spoke of the difference between sustaining and lifting power, saying that an ordinary man could sustain two thousand pounds, while he could and all diseases arising from a disordered only lift about five hundred. After liver or weakness of the stomach and digestion some other remarks, he proceeded to organs, are speedily and permanently cured by a platform on which hung ten keges of the GERMAN BITTERS. nails, weighing one hundred pounds each. The kegs and chain weighing | reputation surpassing that of any similar pro ninety-seven more. This he lifted with apparent ease. He then asked if the most severe and long-standing any of the audience wished to exercise at lifting. No one appearing, he took up his one hundred and eighty pound dumb bell, and held it out arm's ength; then with two dumb bells, of one hundred pounds each, lifting them above his head alternately. Soon after he sustained himself by the little finger of the left hand (he weighs one hundred and fifty pounds), and afterward exercised hanging by the middle finger of the right hand. He then lifted up a barrel of flour, which weighed two hundred and seventeen dealers in medicines everywhere, at 75 cents pounds.
